ABSTRACT

In this thesis paper, I will document and analyze the process of making my graduate thesis film, Thrown. I will start by stating my overall thesis statement, then move into the evaluation of my performance in regards to each specific area of the filmmaking process. I will reflect how I translated my learning at the University of New Orleans in a practical application short film exercise and detail my successes and struggles throughout the process. The goal of this investigation is to understand how I can improve in the future. In the end, I will determine if my thesis proves true, the level of my success in individual aspects of filmmaking, and the overall efficacy of Thrown as a short film.

Key words: short film, thesis, Thrown, family, Chris Gayden
CHAPTER 1
INTRODUCTION

Are there requisite universal axioms needed in order to create exceptional works of cinematic art? I believe that exceptional work can be achieved if the acceptance of compromise is eliminated from the filmmaking process. Despite an individual’s level of experience, environment, or situational limitations… all can be overcome to deliver an extraordinary quality of cinematic storytelling, if the filmmaker sets the highest standards for themselves and does not waver. Within this paper I will analyze my ability to eliminate compromise from the process of creating the thesis film Thrown. I will evaluate my comprehensive knowledge of filmmaking gained at the University of New Orleans as applied to the execution of creating and producing the short film Thrown. Specifically, I will examine my roles performed as the writer, director, producer, and editor of the project. I will reflect upon and determine the effectiveness and quality of results in these components of the filmmaking process that fell under my leadership, which included: script, casting, location choices, direction, cinematography, production design, editing, etc. After reflection upon my own performance during this exercise, I hope to gain insight into areas I can improve. In conclusion, I will determine whether this project qualifies on the level of an exceptional work of art according to my perception and self-appointed standards.
CHARACTERS PLOTTED

The protagonist of the story Sam Murphy, played by Luke Sexton, is a banged up former rodeo cowboy just released from court-ordered rehabilitation for alcohol dependence. Sam’s goal of the film is to reconnect with his young daughter who is in the care of his estranged ex-wife and her new husband. Though Sam’s intentions are noble, his underlying sense of selfish pride and entitlement taint his decision-making. The character Lila Murphy, played by Andi Bryan, is the daughter of Sam Murphy and Charlotte Bertts. Lila seemingly lacks understanding of the adult circumstances encompassing her parents’ relationship and current environment. She is Sam’s most ardent supporter and represents the manifestation of Sam’s goal structurally within the script. The character of Charlotte Bertts, played by Chelsea Bryan, is the ex-wife of Sam and the protective mother of Lila. Charlotte is bruised emotionally from her previous relationship and is motivated to find a healthier path for her daughter and herself. Deputy Bertts, played by Tyler Gibbs, is the stoic no-nonsense husband of Charlotte and the newly minted stepfather of Lila. Bertts is excited by the idea of his new instant family and views the idea of Sam re-entering the picture to be very threatening. Deputy Bertts functions as the primary antagonistic force for Sam attaining his goal because of the collateral effect it will have upon his own hope for happiness and control. The character Pops Murphy, played by Phil Karnell, is Sam’s sage father. Pops offers restrained and cautious advice to his defiant son. His interaction with Sam provides vital exposition for the viewer and sets the stage for impending conflict to follow. The bartender, played by Lance Nelson, innocently suffers the tragic consequence of Sam and Deputy Bertts’ unavoidable conflict.
WRITING

The initial concept for this screenplay was conceived in the Advanced Screenwriting class, taught by Erik Hansen, during the spring semester of my first year of graduate study. I initially intended to make this film in the fall of my second year, but I sacrificed that opportunity to help my classmates achieve their projects at that time. Though I did not make a movie of my own, I gained valuable experience in the production of other projects as Director of Photography for many of my classmates’ films. The original eight-page script remained dormant as I matriculated further into the program. The following year I was enrolled in professor Erik Hansen’s Thesis Writing class and began working on a completely different idea. The idea I was developing was inherently more complicated and fostered concerns of execution from a practical production standpoint. I was at a crossroads with a project I had invested a lot of time upon, and I questioned its feasibility of being produced. That is when Erik encouraged me to revisit the script that became the film Thrown. He thought it possessed components that, if effectively extrapolated, had the potential to become a compelling project.

At this time, I took his advice and saw a clearer path to creating a film within the personal and practical limitations I would face. Essentially the original script, entitled Sam, revolved around a weathered blues musician locked in an existential existence. The appeal of this script was seated in the relationships between Sam, his ex-wife, and a Sheriff that naturally induced conflict. This eight-page original version of the script possessed a nice foundation, but needed enhancement from techniques I acquired from professors Erik Hansen’s screenwriting and Henry Griffin’s story conceptualization courses.

I changed the backstory of the protagonist Sam Murphy from a weathered bluesman to a broken-down rodeo cowboy. I wanted the world of the rodeo to be on the periphery of the story in order to provide a way to cinematically represent the strength of the emotional bond between Sam and his daughter Lila. A core element from Professor Hansen’s courses was “Show, don’t tell” and I attempted to implement this as often as I could while making this film. Sam and Lila’s connection is actualized by the present of a bike, which Sam attempts to deliver to Lila on her birthday. Lila comments on this present as, “That’s not a bike, it’s a bull.” The changing of the story world presented a visual metaphor for the struggle of the protagonist, Sam. The occupation of a rodeo cowboy is to hang on to the bull as long as they can until they are thrown off. Cowboys don’t easily admit defeat as they try to tame an unruly beast. Therefore, the metaphorical bull the destructively prideful Sam is struggling with in this story is alcoholism, which has the potential to be far less forgiving than any real livestock. From this duality of theme, I decided on the title of the film Thrown.

In the final version of the script, I wanted the goal of the protagonist to be made as clear as possible from the outset, in order to allow the audience to track the progress of Sam achieving his goal and elicit audience emotion when he fails. Sam’s goal, which is to be reunited with his daughter, is disseminated through direct dialog as Sam addresses a court-ordered recovery group in the opening scene of the movie. I augmented this moment photographically by noting in the script that this is the first time the audience sees Sam’s face as he recites his goal.

Lila is the physical representation of Sam’s goal, which presented the opportunity to write scenes that intercut between Lila in her environment and Sam as he moves toward Lila. This structure provided hierarchy of knowledge, where the audience is privy to information that Sam does not have. I provided information to the audience that is outside of Sam’s awareness so that tension begins to build and investment by the viewer into the protagonist’s plight is increased. I tried to incorporate this structure in the script in order to directly lead the postproduction edit. The script’s format is intended to build tension between the characters, heightening audience anticipation for resolution. Sam’s scenes in the first half of the film are designed to reveal his building frustration and anxiousness to reach his daughter. These scenes are balanced and intercut with Lila’s world and the characters in her environment that have an antagonistic impact on Sam achieving reconnection with Lila. I was able to create economy of location and character by placing the antagonist, Deputy Ber tts, in Lila’s environment, again allowing the audience to build anticipation for an inevitable confrontation with Sam. These choices not only aided in providing a script that was practical to achieve, they furnished a small cast with little extraneous distraction to the audience from engaging with essential characters and themes. There are classical elements of successful script structure that I tried to implement within the story structure. For example, the midpoint of the script, where the protagonist falls further away from achieving his goal, occurs at the conclusion of the confrontational standoff between Charlotte, Deputy Ber tts and Sam in front of Lila’s house. This scene concludes the development for the characters and propels the script forward into action. Charlotte decides to sign custody papers, Deputy Ber tts is compelled to confront Sam, and Sam starts to lose his battle with self-control. The greatest challenge was to script the dual action between Lila riding her bike and Sam’s drinking and fighting with the Deputy. The purpose of including these shots of Lila on her bike is to show consequences of Sam’s decisions in contrast to his goal represented by Lila. Sam is taking the ride of alcoholism that is underpinned by selfish pride and Lila is riding her bull/bike. This decision is a gamble but I aspired to create a film that has depth, forcing the audience to make the connection (if I could adequately assemble the pieces in production and post-production). The resolution of the script presents a flawed yet nobly intended protagonist who finally achieves his goal of connecting with his daughter, albeit under tragic circumstances. Again, the scripted conclusion uses intercutting performances (while Lila and Sam talk on the phone) with my full intention to pull at the heartstrings of the audience as best I could.

Overall the writing process started off smoothly because I already had a general vision of the characters, the goal of the protagonist, and the conflict I wanted to incite. However, as the screenwriting process continued, I struggled to make sure every line of dialog was purposeful when the pace of the film slowed and characters encountered each other. I knew where I wanted the story and characters to end up, but with so many possibilities and paths to get there, I struggled to put the final stamp on the script. I knew production was coming and that I needed to begin rehearsals, but with my thesis statement in mind, I did not want to move forward until I had the elements of story I desired as firmly posited in the script as possible.
CASTING

The battle to acquire the strongest performances possible for any project is largely waged during the casting process. Only having the ability to offer actors the opportunity and experience of participating, I was concerned for the level of performances and therefore the quality of the finished project. My anxiety was high as I headed into the casting process; the probability of finding performers that could make the time commitment and possessed the specific qualities each character called for seemed very low. I have been part of several student auditions that have delivered varying levels of success, including: low turnout, aspiring actors merely looking to experience the audition process, and general lack of enthusiasm. I tried to counter what I have experienced by conducting auditions a little differently. On the Internet, I combed through dozens of local acting groups and casting pages, reviewing profiles of individuals that met some of the criteria for specific characters. I compiled a list, and contacted individuals with information on the film and an invitation to audition. I found this process to be highly efficient. Whether the actors possessed the attributes or talent level I was hoping to cast, the personal invitation delivered an enthusiasm and desire for the project I have not witnessed in other open student auditions. Some of the actors shared that they face rejection regularly, and the idea that they were invited or handpicked and contacted to audition was extremely motivating. Detractors might point to the fact that I could have missed on a great performance noting that the audition was not traditionally defined as “open.” However, I tried to invite all the actors that I found on a surface level who possessed the qualifications for the scripted characters. Approaching the casting process in this manner was used for casting all of the male roles.

The part of Sam was given to Luke Sexton from Shreveport, Louisiana. I contacted him through a stuntman Facebook group, and though he was slightly younger than I had initially envisioned, he projected a ruggedness that suited the role. He possesses a familiarity with film sets from his stunt work and has an extensive theatrical background from his major study in college. In the audition Luke workshopped prepared script sides involving the character of Sam and his daughter Lila (performed in the audition by producer Jade Hewitt). I periodically changed situations in the scene or requested an alteration of his performance to which he competently delivered. His performance in this setting completely separated himself from the other actors under consideration for Sam and I knew as soon as it was over that he would have the role. Luke’s stunt background was also a tremendous asset for the production since the climactic scene in the film called for a fight, a contingency that made the decision even more appealing.

Deputy Bertts was given to Tyler Gibbs. Tyler originally read for the role of Sam, but even while he performed sides tailored for that character it was evident to me that he might prove to be better suited for the role of the Deputy. After finishing the prepared material for the character of Sam, he workshopped some sides prepared for the character of the Deputy and performed admirably. Tyler has a stoic demeanor, which I hoped would translate to the screen that matched my original vision for Deputy Bertts. In meeting with Tyler I noticed he also was inclined to look out for his own best interest. Though this might be viewed as a potentially difficult personal characteristic to deal with, I saw this trait aligning with the nature of the character of Deputy Bertts and that his personality contrasted nicely against some of the characteristics that composed Luke’s natural characteristics. Tyler also brought a stunt background, which I believed would match the needs for the climactic fight scene.

Originally the role of Pops was scripted as Sam’s uncle. This role was given to David Cole, a New Orleans native. He read for Deputy Bertts and though his performance was less suited than Tyler’s, his enthusiasm and attitude were desired on set. He was a very easy guy to talk to, he was enthusiastic, and was committed to performance. There was just enough age variance between Luke and David that I thought David could fill the role. Things changed involving this role during the rehearsal process, however, which will be addressed later.

The female characters were not involved in the audition process. However, when scripting this story, the actual real-life mother and daughter duo of Chelsea and Andi Bryan were in the forefront of my mind. My producer Jade and I simply visited their home and discussed their interest in the opportunity. I was very fortunate to gain their immediate participation without hesitation. Previously I had seen Chelsea in several student productions and knew she could deliver the type of performance I was looking for. I was aware of all the cautionary stories of working with children on set and the difficulties and logistical issues that can restrict production. Nevertheless, I believed if Andi Bryan was in the role of Lila, many of these issues could be minimized. I had seen her in one or two short films previously, so I knew she entered the project with some experience. Having her actual mother play her screen mother would more than likely strengthen her performance through the natural chemistry that exists in their real life relationship. The down time between performance and production setups can require added responsibilities on a production if a child is involved. I believed having the actual parent of Andi would allow her to remain confident and comfortable during production time. In this situation the structure was built into each production day by having her mother in the cast and performing in most of the scenes together. In addition, Jade quickly developed a rapport with Andi that quickly eased any hesitation I might have had about Andi’s impending comfort level and ability to interact with cast and crew.
One of the first decisions I had to make regarding the actual production process was to shoot on location as opposed to shooting at the University of New Orleans Film and Theatre soundstage. I did not have money or labor to build out sets, so I quickly knew the soundstage was not going to be an option and that I was going to have to forego the complete control of light, production sound, and other desired aspects of filmmaking. Because I was working with a limited budget and limited resources, the scouting and procurement of locations took on extra importance because these selections also needed to provide the majority of the production value equated to production design. The subject matter lent itself to a more rural backdrop; however, there were other factors that dictated that the production had to be shot in New Orleans. These factors were: my extremely low budget, the ability to roster a crew, and the access to school equipment. The further I moved the production away from UNO the more cost I would accrue, whether for gas or lodging, or a number of other contingencies. I also believed if I moved the project outside of New Orleans I would greatly increase the risk of the crew developing issues with participation. I have witnessed this issue complicate several other student projects that I have participated on. Though the idea of shooting in New Orleans may not seem ideal for the subject matter of this project, there were decisions that I could make to minimize any deleterious impact.

I chose a UNO classroom for a sterile environment of the rehab meeting. The UNO bookstore made for a convenient location for a nondescript department store that was only used for two shots in the film. The parking lot of the Performing Arts Center would be empty on the weekend to shoot Sam leaving the rehab center. I believe these locations did not need to be established cinematically from a story standpoint or from a production perspective. Together they created an easily contained shooting schedule. The location for Pop’s ranch was more difficult to find. I was excited to contact the equestrian center location in City Park; however, they were unresponsive to a student film shoot on their property. After several other dead ends, producer Jade Hewitt contacted Good Horse LLC on the Westbank in New Orleans. Good Horse had a couple of acres carved out in the woods, a horse pen, and a couple of horses. Of course it rained prior to shooting, which made the pen unsafe for the horses. As a result, we were forced to shoot right outside the horse pen in the clearing intended for trucks and trailers. Lila’s house, also on the Westbank, was the home of one of Jade’s relatives. It was not the most ideal location for shooting, but accessibility was the primary determining factor. I would have preferred a more rural setting, but I was not able to find the proper environment that was also within the New Orleans area in order to help facilitate practical travel of cast and crew. The driving shots in the truck were to be picked up throughout the production near the surrounding areas of several of the locations. I was too cavalier in my initial consideration of these elements. I should have been more rigid in my planning of these shots and the specific road locations where they would take place. They proved more difficult to achieve and execute than had been anticipated and required more structure and planned choreography. The bar scene would ideally take place in a rural honkytonk, but the dive bar Snake and Jake’s, and its dingy interior and unique look, suited the environment for the conflict between Sam and the deputy. The owner of the bar was very gracious and allowed total access during the day, as this business operates only at night and early into the morning, which suited our production needs.
I dedicated a significant portion of my script towards emphasizing non-verbal communication between characters. I find enjoyment in performances that are understated and provide the audience with insight into the character’s mental state through non-verbal body language and communication. I am less stimulated by lengthy dialog and have always been intrigued when actors emote and display depth through mannerisms that evoke intent and communicate psychological information of the character to the audience. I really enjoy movies and performances like Bill Murray in Lost in Translation (directed by Sofia Copola) and Broken Flowers (directed by Jim Jarmusch), Clint Eastwood in Unforgiven (directed by Clint Eastwood), and Jack O’Connell in ‘71 (directed by Yann Demange). These films take advantage of the subtleties of performance to reveal character’s psychological states and disseminate information. Reading the actions of a character requires a cognitive investment from the audience, as opposed to being a non-participant and passively absorbing every character reaction and motive through stated dialog. Movies are visual, and I wanted to reflect and emphasize the descriptions in the script as to how performances were going to be “viewed” on screen and not just displayed on paper. I tried to make the script a tool for actors to assimilate those nuances into the performances. By creating a script with these nuances, and desiring these types of performances, I created my biggest challenge for directing this film. I believed if my personal preference or “style” was to emphasize the subtleties of non-verbal cues for the audience, I must make sure the actors’ understanding of the script was sufficient to actualize the intent and design.

After casting, the first thing I did was drive to Shreveport to spend some time with Luke and go over the script. The trip was valuable to set the tone for the production in the mind of my principal actor. The practical side of no-budget student filmmaking quickly materialized at the
The distance of Luke to New Orleans, coupled with the other cast members’ schedules, was going to be an obstacle for the important preparation for the project. The trip to Shreveport alone cost upwards of $150 dollars (gas and meals), and I immediately realized my budget could go quickly if I did not pay close attention. To my frustration and devastation, the ability to organize rehearsals that included full cast participation stayed outside my ability to establish. Luke worked for an adventure park in Shreveport, whose primary business hours were conducted on the weekends. This conflicted with the other male characters, whose jobs were during weekdays. I could not find a time when the male performers could come together. The female characters, comprised of a working mother and an eight year old, also proved to create insurmountable problems with scheduling. Though compromise now had a stranglehold around my project, I decided to do my best and meet with all the characters individually at their homes and work with them as best I could. I knew these meetings could not represent the effectiveness of actual rehearsals, but I tried to maximize each experience for the actors as best I could.

Practically exasperated a week before the production was to begin, I did manage to schedule one rehearsal with all the male characters present. Unable to gain access space at the Performing Arts Center, I secured a room in the UNO student center to recreate their scenes. Luke and Tyler’s scenes were my primary focus for our abbreviated time. Luke had great suggestions and instincts. Tyler continually wanted to rework/add lines to construct more focus and screen time for his character. I capitulated to most of his requests in order to preserve interest, knowing as long as I could get the feel and essence of his character in the performance, any extraneous embellishments could be removed in postproduction. After Luke and Tyler worked their scenes, Luke began the scenes with David. My enthusiasm for David’s potential performance quickly evaporated. Tasked with a supporting role as opposed to the more prominent role he originally auditioned for, it proved very difficult for David to remain motivated. It just was not working for the character; the circumstances adversely affected David’s rehearsal performance. This scene between Sam and his uncle/mentor was an essential vehicle to provide exposition for the audience. It appears small but it is very important to the character of Sam, his arc, and the structure of the film. I made an emergency call to Phil Karnell (an acting heavy-weight in my mind) and met with him the next day. I explained the importance of this scene, the situation I was facing, and he agreed to play the role. I adjusted the part from Sam’s uncle to his father, Pops. I was relieved to know now the performance and scene would exceed my expectations because of Phil Karnell’s involvement.

I had hopes of working with the child-actor Andi more than I was able to establish. Scheduling and communication were difficult during the pre-production process for Chelsea and Andi. I have always heard of the difficulties of working with young inexperienced actors, so I tried to consider how this character would be presented on screen in the script. I attempted to limit her actual screen exposure in terms of performance by relying on the supporting characters around Lila. I formatted the script so that her performances were primarily driven by her presence alone and not requiring heavy dialog. I was going to have to rely on this planning, because accessibility to rehearsal was limited to a couple of home visits that were difficult to control and focus. My desire to have her performance thoroughly vetted during the preproduction portion of this project was not actuated. I was going to have to place reliance more heavily than I wanted on direction that occurred on set. I fretted that now there were unique requirements of performance that must be delivered for impactful performance after only limited preparation.

This movie essentially revolves around a “cowboy,” stereotypically men of few words. Because my script was lighter in dialog than most, I needed to do a great job emphasizing these moments in the script so they were understood by the cast, in order to appear within their performances, especially Sam. This was a very ambitious undertaking considering my general lack of experience working with actors, the actors’ experience level, and the absence of quality rehearsals. Nevertheless, I would visit with each performer before scenes and make sure that their characters’ emotional state was synced properly to the period of time in the script. I wanted to make sure the energy entering each scene was connected to what the script was calling for. Each actor involved in the project had a different comfort level, competence, and expectation of direction in order to deliver their best performance. This required me to adjust my directing style depending on who was performing. Luke had a strong inclination for what performance choices he wanted to bring to the character of Sam, and those choices became smoother and stronger after a few takes. With Luke I just had to be patient and wait for that strength and comfort level to emerge. Tyler was very aggressive and brazen with adlibs and dialog suggestions on set. I had to be attentive to all his suggestions, constantly discussing the advantages and problems of each script adjustment. On occasion those suggestions were really good; other times I got the impression he was trying to increase his screen presence and I had to as deftly as possible bring him back to the desired content. Once we were in agreement, he delivered a consistent performance. Chelsea was incredible to work with. Before each performance we would have brief discussions to make sure she understood the intensity level of her character and overall connection to character. Once I acknowledged that we had what we needed, she would always offer another take that varied slightly so I would have a choice in the editing room. Though her role was supportive in nature, she operated with great talent and professionalism. As expected, Andi required constant encouragement. She had a great attitude that was fun and full of energy, but her lack of experience did require times of composed tolerance as a director. Some scenes just required her presence in the scene as prescribed through script structure; otherwise, I fear the proposition of working with a child would have been almost impractical. The climactic scene with Sam required Chelsea to feed her lines from off screen so Andi could just repeat and mimic performance in order to achieve proper technique and intent. Again, the structure of the script allowed for me to get away with this because I knew I wanted to keep the focus on Sam. In the edit, I knew I was going to cut away from Lila and remain on Sam’s reactions. Working with Andi proved extremely challenging and I was very fortunate to have both Chelsea and Jade there to help her and comfort her in a way I couldn’t.
CHAPTER 7
COSTUME, HAIR AND MAKEUP

All of the action in the film takes place during one day. The period of time is established as contemporary. The challenge for costume and hair and makeup was to create consistent looks from scene to scene and from production day to production day. Duplicate wardrobes were acquired for the protagonist, since he was scheduled for almost every production day. Most costume considerations were pretty straightforward; the sheriff’s uniform was rented at a local costume shop; as well as, cowboy hats, blue jeans, etc. The biggest unique challenge for the makeup department was the fake blood for the bartender’s gunshot wound. Kristina Nicely prepared the mockup well and this practical effect was adequate for the scene. That coverage was shot last because I failed to have duplicate wardrobes for the bartender, but it did not affect the production or shooting schedule for the most part.
CHAPTER 8
PRODUCTION DESIGN

As previously mentioned, the production design was tied closely to the selection of the locations. I did not have the resources to shoot on a sound stage and, by forgoing that option, it was in the best interest of the production to make the practical locations an asset to the film. Originally I wanted to mimic the production design of Traffic (directed by Steven Soderbergh), where color palettes are distinct to the environment of specific characters. Sam’s environment was to be dark and rough, with deep colors. This environment was to contrast with a softer, safer, pastel environment for Lila. I believe this was achieved to a small extent for this project, however, I would not say there is a stark delineation between different environments because of production design. The locations that were chosen were all active places of residence and business that allowed access for shooting, but did not accommodate set dressing the environments prior to the shooting schedule. Once we arrived on set, skeleton set dressing was assembled for scenes as time allowed. Most locations where simply augmented to enhance what was already present. For instance, at the ranch location, there were horse trailers and hay bales. We simply arranged those resources to create an environment that benefitted the scene. Another example would be the bar; red Christmas lights are permanent fixtures in the location, so we augmented what already existed with extra red strings in order to try and create a dangerous space. The sterile, organized, and nicely appointed house that was the primary environment for Lila provided contrast to Sam’s environment. This contrast was intended to express the separation between the two characters for the viewer. The locations secured had to have some elements of desired production design needs, then simple embellishment and augmentation of props and set dressing was preformed. Producer Jade Hewitt was able to secure the donation of a Sherriff car from a local prop house for two days of production. This addition really changed the perspective of the exterior of Lila’s house exterior, strengthened the story, and subtly set the stage for the inevitable conflict within the narrative.
CHAPTER 9
CINEMATOGRAPHY

I wanted to photograph this film myself. I have gained the experience of shooting other projects during my studies at UNO, which originally justified this desire. I was responsible for this film and I initially saw it as a favorable time to showcase my interpretation of cinematography as a powerful storytelling tool in a way that rarely affords itself when executing someone else’s creative vision. I still have regrets that I could not follow through with this ambition. I was not able to cultivate an environment that I believed shooting Thrown myself, would be successful. Three weeks before production, I chose not to follow this path and decided to ask Trenton Mynatt to be the Cinematographer. I made this decision for several reasons. As the project approached, there were several obstacles to overcome that required my time-management to be re-evaluated. Other aspects of preparation for the film were not being attended to, and I feared there were going to be inevitable problems during production that would require all of my attention. Even though I failed in my own aspirations, I recognized the practical advantages Trenton would bring to the project and I wanted to take advantage of the strong relationships Trenton had with the crew. Though I was responsible for this film, I was aware that, sociologically, I was an outsider among the students that comprised the crew. I did not possess the strong relationships that Trenton had cultivated with crew members for this particular project.

Visually, I am inspired by the full display of technique consistently executed by the cinematographer Roger Deakins in films like, The Assassination of Jesse James by the Coward Robert Ford (directed by Andrew Dominik). The standard of excellence in framing and use of subtle camera movement have inspired me to strengthen my own skills during my time of study at The University of New Orleans. I wanted this project to carry a similar level in attention to detail and execution. I had a very strong visual plan, but that plan was for the most part self-contained. I failed to create excitement and a vested understanding of my photographic plan in order to elevate execution. In the weeks leading up to production, limited time and availability among the crewmembers of the camera department compromised the quantity and quality of pre-production preparation I desired. I could not organize comprehensive meetings. I could not inspire passionate time investment that would deliver results to the standard I originally desired for this project. This was one of my biggest disappointments and lessons of this process.

Inevitably, my inability to conduct the level of preproduction is the facet of the filmmaking process that allowed compromise to enter the filmmaking process the most. I generated detailed overheads, shot lists, and storyboarded important scenes, but I failed in creating interest in those tools outside of myself. I was able to schedule one walk through on location for the climactic scene just days prior to shooting. All of the members of the crew are smart and capable individuals and I have respect for everyone that participated. However, I take responsibility and culpability in failed leadership that was needed in order to eliminate compromise from the project completely. At this time I was committed to shoot and I was thankful for the crew’s willingness to participate during the actual production days. One of the invaluable lessons I take from creating this thesis project is: if I ever want to develop the highest expectations for elevated future work, I must require exceptional preproduction preparation from everyone involved and a superior form of leadership from myself that exceeds the effort I conducted for this project. This is not a new lesson I needed to learn, but one I obviously needed to have reiterated and experience in order to grow and implement in the future.

The visual plan I had composed for the film was to use shots that were longer in duration and wider in scope in order to isolate both Sam and Lila in each of their spaces as much as possible. I wanted the audience to resonate with their disconnect and isolation. I wanted each character to have a sense of something missing visually. I also wanted to take advantage of the use of a dolly in order to reframe the characters as action unfolds, especially at the beginning of the scenes. This use of camera movement would allow me to achieve a few different applications. In some instances I wanted to emphasize certain components of scenes without cutting and abruptly changing the focus of the audience. For example, camera movement would aid in scenes where Lila is present but where most of the action involves the adults. I could establish Lila in the space without cutting and then move to Charlotte and Deputy Bertts. The camera movement allowed me to direct the audience to her presence, then redirect their attention to the interaction of the other characters. I also wanted to use movement to subtly tighten or loosen the perspective of the scene as it began or ended in order to subconsciously invite emotional investment and tracking of characters. Once into scenes the camera remained fixed, that is, until the fight in the bar. For the fight, handheld camerawork was chosen in order to add kinetic energy and amplify intensity to the action, effectively taking the audience into the action.

Fluctuating weather conditions and regimented shooting schedules altered plans for driving shots of Sam in his truck. These shots were the most difficult to coordinate from a cinematography standpoint. I learned shots such as these require the most coordination, collaboration, and time to execute properly. I am exceptionally grateful for the camera operator, Barry Cunningham, for diligently staying with the project. I definitely should have done a better job of leading communication between Trenton and myself. I do not believe I fully communicated the visual plan as competently as I could have in order to elicit the benefit of passionate full immersion into the project. My inability to provide exceptional leadership allowed for satisfactory results to be the expectation level. For example, the bar scene was established from a different perspective than I had originally conceptualized. Aesthetically, this new angle was a nicer shot than I had called for to establish the scene but subsequently initiated a different path of coverage from that new starting point that I thought would be less impactful once we moved in from the initial shot. I relented under the hopes of shooting both options, but time quickly became an issue and we proceeded down the most logical visual structure and coverage from where we started. Regardless, Trenton did offer some nice visual suggestions during production. For instance, the shot of Sam’s reflection in the door window of the bar that turned out to be one of my favorite shots in the film. Even so, I do not think I led the overall collaboration between Director and Director of Photography to a level that took advantage of everyone’s maximum potential. The camera department as a whole competently achieved proper exposure and focus during the project, an easily taken for granted execution but one I am thankful for.

The lighting design was to be motivated by “practical” sources. Subtle augmentation of light and fixtures that existed in each scene was what I wanted to initiate for this production. The subject matter did not lend itself to an over-produced production value. I wanted the film to be seated in the classicism construct. The film takes place during the day. While filming interiors, lights were positioned outside windows for consistent amplitude and to provide key light. With exterior scenes, backgrounds and character positioning were considered (as advantageously as possible) to make the best use of the single source of the sun. The bar scene called for the most extensive lighting setup. Snake and Jake’s had a very dark interior, so canned lights were brought in over the bar and background tables and established as practical lighting sources. As noted previously, red Christmas lights line the walls of the bar. In camera Bokeh (light bloom) created separation for the characters against the dark background elevating the need for unmotivated backlights.
POST PRODUCTION

From the onset of conceptualizing this thesis project, my desire for the postproduction workflow was to be easier than any other part of the filmmaking process. I wanted to follow the Hitchcock paradigm where all of the creative decisions are performed during preproduction, leaving the remainder of the film process to committed execution. I wanted a postproduction structure that was not responsible for creative creation or repurposing of content, but one that was of simple alignment of specific content that had been conceptualized during the preproduction process. I was unable to create this paradigm. The postproduction process was very instructional yet extremely difficult to arrive at a suitable result. My deficiency in leadership during the preproduction and production phases of the film allowed room for compromise to develop and problems to occur that I had to try and minimize in the postproduction phase. I experienced a very painstakingly long process of trial and error massaging the content to deliver a level of satisfaction. Whether because of large discrepancies, minor compromises, or an inability to conduct comprehensive follow through of plan during production, as mistakes compiled, an erosion to the strength of the narrative occurred which was revealed during the editing process.

The plurality of all of the difficulties I faced during the postproduction phase of production can be directly linked to my own compromise and lack of follow through in the preproduction and production phases of the project. Dealing with issues in postproduction was extremely edifying for my development of postproduction skills. However, after analysis, I am thankful for the larger lesson; I need a greater commitment and focus during preproduction and production, in order to minimize or eliminate future difficulties during postproduction. Again, this is not necessarily a lesson I was unaware of, but one that I believe I needed to experience so that I could see that the level of dedication to preproduction and production during this project was not adequate to deliver the end result I had aspired to. I had to come to terms with an uncomfortable level of compromise with regard to several aspects of my original intentions and work extremely hard in postproduction to construct a film as well as I possibly could.

There are several situations during this project that illustrate where difficulties occurred during preproduction and production, that forced me to compromise my original conception of this film’s postproduction process and ultimately altered the final product. For example, I believe some story elements could have been established and depicted with a greater degree of strength. Lila writing her letter to Sam during the opening shot could have been photographed with more care. Under pressure to stay on time with the shooting schedule, dealing with a child actor, and my ineffectiveness of communicating the importance of the shot, all undermined the ability to clearly establish the strength of the relationship between father and daughter during the opening shot of the film. I tried to overlay the audio of the subsequent scene over this shot in order to connect the shots and characters, but I do wish this element had been established a little more clearly. The actor was present, the camera rolled, the actions were recorded, but with a little better follow through and/or leadership, this story element could have been much stronger with or without an audio overlay simply from minor production adjustments. At times I failed in the leadership of the collaborative process with actors. Each actor brought unique qualities with varying degrees of capability and experience. I failed to illuminate understanding with the lead actor to appropriately display the proper emotive level required for an initial scene in the bar. This scene had to be removed from the story as a consequence of his unnatural performance. I did not direct the proper adjustments to correct his performance during production, which led to the elimination of the first part of the bar scene that included a brief conversation with the bartender. Another specific mistake on my part that illustrates the errors not addressed in the preproduction and the production phase, which led to compromise in the postproduction phase, occurred during the scene when Lila receives her bike from the deputy. There was no sound for the only useable take delivered by the child actor. I did not create a system of double-checking or possibly an environment where the production sound mixer felt comfortable enough to make me aware that there was a problem. In postproduction I had to reconstruct her audio from other takes. These are just a few examples of several oversights that contributed to the laborious undertaking I created for myself in postproduction.

Editing the production sound required an investment almost proportionately equal in time to the time invested in the picture edit. Again, I was exposed to a lesson that I understood prior to the shooting but obviously I needed to experience the potential difficulties in its execution to learn from and grow from as a filmmaker. The decision to shoot at practical locations was made to take advantage of natural production design and budgetary necessity. In doing so, clean production sound would be a difficult task to attain. The film was shot early fall during the peak of the cicada/locust cacophony each year. Due to the nature of character (a cowboy), I thought the potential ambient noise in the background would not be too off-putting. Inevitably they bloomed the loudest during one of the more technical, highly choreographed, and rigidly scheduled scenes in the movie (when Sam first arrives in the street in front of Lila’s). The locusts were not just in this scene, they were almost at a volume level that overtook moments in the scene from an audio standpoint. Due to difficulty making arrangements with schedules that eliminated the option for ADR sessions, cicada bloom was added to every outdoor scene in the movie in order to establish them early on for the audience and lessen the jarring impact during places where it was impossible to remove them. Working on the production sound was an incredibly meticulous process in order to bring it to a satisfactory level.
The original plan for the coloring of the movie was to be de-saturated. The tone of the story is very somber, and I wanted to have a dull and subdued color scheme to be established. This decision proved to be fortuitous for another reason as well. The climactic shot of the film (when Sam is seated on the ground in the bar talking on the phone to Lila) was unintentionally filmed underexposed. This circumstance left little leeway for digital manipulation without creating noise in the image, because much of the frame was in the knee of the latitude range of the recording medium. Because this circumstance occurred in the most important scene of this film (the climax), I chose to not crush the blacks for any shot in the movie. Again, this rigorous process was extrapolated by the fact that somehow some scenes were shot in different color spaces. Without crushed blacks and overall desaturation, the look of the film still reflects the doleful themes of content and the tragic emotions the film desires to elicit within the audience.

The musical score was executed as closely to the original plan as I could have hoped for. I wanted to find a guitar player who had the ability to recreate a specific sound and possessed the perspective to understand the feeling I wanted the music to establish and carry. The music was to be present throughout the entirety of the film, dipping and fading under specific dialog scenes when necessary. I thought finding and collaborating with this person was going to be difficult; however, I was very fortunate to have the right set of circumstances fall into place. A respected musical department faculty member referred me to UNO musical student Adam Guthrie. For general understanding of style and tone, I shared a video clip of famed musical producer Daniel Lanois improvising on a guitar in his home studio. I also conducted sessions that included focused analysis of the film with Adam, in order to disseminate a comprehensive knowledge of the project. In a week’s time, Adam returned with the unpolished, gritty, sound design that is in the film. The music intentionally played a very pivotal role in the telling of this story cinematically. The music helps the audience to follow Sam’s journey even when the action is away from Sam. When the film shifts to Lila’s environment, the music aids in the intention to subtly encourage the audience to correlate the consequences of other characters’ actions as they impact Sam’s goal of reconnecting with his daughter. If the music was to be light and airy or changed dramatically when environments changed, I believe it would invite the audience to view those scenes with a different perspective. By keeping the sound consistent from the time it is introduced with the main character Sam at the beginning of the film, the subsequent scenes’ actions (even when Sam is not present) are psychologically shaped with the perception of consequences towards Sam’s goal for the audience. My intention was for the music to help connect and shape perspective of actions that are consequential to Sam’s journey of reaching his goal within the viewer for every scene in the movie.

During the postproduction process, I received invaluable contribution from Jade Hewitt with the setup and finishing workflow. Jade meticulously organized footage, down-converted easily managed file sizes, and synched audio and video. She showed unmatched knowledge, patience, and skill in dealing with these operations. Consequently, she competently walked the project through the final exporting stage of procedure once picture lock and sound editing were completed. She also helped create exports for multiple delivery options. All of these functions are very technical and require dedicated time investment and sophisticated knowledge. Jade navigated through all of these processes with ease and was a major contributor to the film in this capacity.
Moviemaking as an art form is fundamentally defined by telling stories in a visual medium. The relationship between the writer, director, editor, and cinematographer is the foundation for a successful movie. The collective understanding of the story to be told by these four departments is the starting point for a strong project. The ability to move beyond this basic understanding and to actualize the details and subtleties of a particular story can separate a project from other films and in doing so attain a level of exceptional execution. Therefore, in order for a project to become exceptional, it is the quality of those essential collaborations and relationships that provides a chance for a project to reach its fullest potential. If a project benefits from high quality collaborations and understanding, it can move from just the general address of story to a more elevated and sophisticated cinematic experience. This theorized level of exceptional work is what I aspire to participate within as my career progresses.

I wanted to write, direct, edit, and shoot this film myself. I must admit that I leave this project wondering if I should have performed the cinematography myself? Would the project have benefitted from keeping the roles of writer, director, cinematographer and editor all within myself? Under the circumstances, would that have given this project the ability to be exceptional? Maybe?...maybe not. Could this project have reached an exceptional level if I had strengthened my relationships socially within the department among my peers? Maybe?…maybe not. I worked on all of my classmates’ graduate school projects at some level, at some point during our matriculation. This is a unique claim I can state in regards to my graduate class, and one of which I am very proud and would not change in hindsight. Nevertheless, I did not instill a motivation in any of my graduate classmates to want to participate when it was my opportunity to make my thesis film. I did not gain the benefit of valuable collaboration and input from any of the individuals I believe I should have been closest to during my studies at UNO. Should I have been more calculating and strategic in how I interacted with my peers, since the program is designed for each student to rely on classmates’ participation for each other’s work and quality of work? Moving on from my graduate class, did I set myself up socially to receive the best effort from everyone who did participate on this project? Maybe?...maybe not. What I can say definitively is that I need to improve my communication skills and leadership when in a collaborative environment. Even without the cinematography duties, I cannot say I executed the remaining responsibilities I undertook in a manner I would characterize as exceptional. I worked as hard as I could, and tried to make the best decisions in all the circumstances presented; however, I felt I operated within my responsibilities (which includes providing leadership for everyone on the project) with some level of compromise in regards to the expectation level I had originally intended to operate and the standard I originally set for this film project.

Ultimately I have learned, if quality relationships that fosters an investment of time into uncompromisingly developing and actualizing a thoughtful script and production plan, then that is a project that has a chance to be exceptional. I do not think this is an understanding that is unique to me or even gleaned from a rare insight. However, this understanding of how to be exceptional in the future was validated through my experience of fostering this project. The practical experience and the lessons I have learned will be invaluable to my growth as a filmmaker. I look forward to applying the knowledge I learned and the experience I gained during my studies at UNO (which includes this thesis project), so that I may have a chance to create exceptional work in the future. It is because of the knowledge through the teaching that UNO humbly allowed me to receive that allows me to confidently make this claim. The experience of this thesis film and its analysis provide the opportunity to case study how compromise developed in this project, so that I can accept my culpability within that process and in the future correct those mistakes, which I believe will push me to future success. Thank you, University of New Orleans.

To Whom It May Concern,

Please be advised that all University of New Orleans student film projects done in fulfillment of course and degree requirements are covered by general liability and loss or damage by the University insurance policy. Attached is a sample Certificate of Insurance (COI) as evidence of coverage limits. It is not necessary to issue a COI specific to each student film project for the policy to be in place.

This letter confirms that Chris Gayden is a graduate student in the UNO film program and the project currently titled “Thrown” is his thesis project being done in fulfillment of graduate degree requirements.

Should you require more information about the University’s insurance, please contact:

INT. REHAB FACILITY – MORNING

FADE IN.

Flashback: Lila running towards the distance.

SAM (OS)
The mail came yesterday. My daughter sent her birthday list to me. It’s today. She’s six. (pause) Say’s she wants two things. A rodeo bull as a pet... and for me to come home.

The group tamely chuckles. They are supportive of Sam.

A hand (no ring) grips a envelope. The envelope is red with white crayon that has a heart with daddy in it.

SAM (OS CONT’D)
Going to have to be creative about the first part.

Worn boots shift.

SAM (OS CONT’D)
The names Sam Murphy. Back when I was all knees and elbows, I came up on a ranch. Pa was a cattleman. He gave me a love for the rodeo.

Flashback: A man walks onto the rodeo ring dirt in the arena.

SAM (CONT’D)
Got serious bout ridden’ seven years back. Won buckles in seven states. Was movin’ right through the circuits.

Flashback: A cowboy looking down at a bull beneath him. The gate opens and the bull explodes from the chute.

A rodeo buckle.

SAM (OS CONT’D)
Sponsors were lining up for when I jumped pro. I was next and everyone knew it. (pause) Was setting up a life that only I could.

Flashback: A bull in a pen. A bull’s eye blinks. A spine x-ray.

CONTINUED: 2.

SAM (OS CONT’D)
Drew a rank bull in Shreveport.
Named Rango. Book said he always spun right. He came left into my hand. Dropped me inside. They fused my spine... C six & seven.

SAM MURPHY (cowboy, late twenties) stands at a lectern facing an AA group of ten people from all walks of life. He takes a moment before speaking again. His back is rigid.

SAM
Went back to ranch work when I got back on my feet.(pause) Couldn’t ride? So I drank. Got pulled over past November. Took a poke at the patrolman. Cost me a year.(pause)
Only six if I spent thirty days here. (pause) The moral is, I just whipped drinkn. Now, I’m gonna be my daughter’s champion.

Sam reishes the approval of the group.

SAM (CONT’D)
Gonna go get a buckle for that.

mom and I made pancakes....

Lila, springs out of bed straight past Bertts and CHARLOTTE (twenty eight, pretty and determined) ignoring them.
Bertts turns to Charlotte (Lila’s mother) to see if he did something wrong.

Buck shoots a glance over his shoulder.

SAM (CONT’D)
Ma around?

BUCK
At your aunt’s.
Sam kicks the dirt.

BUCK
She made up your old room. Didn’t know your plans?

SAM
Just stopping in on my way to see Lila.

BUCK
On your way to see Lila? Your ex-wife got us on a schedule now, son.

SAM
Yea well, I’m her father.

BUCK
Right, then you can join us on Tuesday. We are going to bring her out here.

SAM
It’s not like that. Tuesday is not her birthday? I deserve to see her today.

Appendix M: Shooting Script

CONTINUED:

BUCK
Life don’t owe you anything Sam.

Buck looks up with disappointment that Sam has not changed.

SAM
You don’t get it.

This isn’t the welcome home Sam wanted. Sam starts to walk back to his truck. He stops.

SAM (CONT’D)
I’ve kicked drinkin’. I’m standin’ tall now. Lila needs me and I’m going to see her.

Sam takes a step towards the truck.

CHARLOTTE

Get out of here Sam. You aren’t welcome here!

SAM

Stop...

CHARLOTTE

I’ve heard it all a thousand times, Sam! Nothing is ever going to change with you!

Charlotte is no longer angry but overcome with emotion. She hands the bottle to Bertts and exits back to house.

Sam can’t believe his misfortune.

SAM

I’m her father.
