Assume the Gulf’s wide mouth, a sharp outcrop of rock licked with sea-slicked lichen. Assume: alone, dawn. I beat my bones on the sand and run, tight-skinned, not she but all body and all outside, all hoping animal.

A mile out, I swim to the rocks and out stretch across the water, stretch out and sun salute. From the jetty just opposite a fisherman also alone, youngish and so in his body’s sunrise wades waist depth to ask for bait. Closer, I see he clearly; almost a heron, arms high to still smoke in the spring tide. I answer.

Assume damp flannel, conscious, skin-tight cling: I’ve none and sorry, and assume, saying so tamely, she.
